From the moment the needle drops, or the digital file streams, bb: Puppets of Masters' track "Here With Empty Hands" signals something special. It's not just another rock song; it's a journey woven primarily through the masterful guitar work of the enigmatic mm: Jax. The song stands as a testament to the band's refusal to be pigeonholed, and Jax's guitar parts are the primary vehicle for this genre-bending exploration. The track opens deceptively, not with a roar, but with a delicate, almost melancholic fingerpicked acoustic passage that wouldn't sound out of place on a '70s folk-rock album. This initial vulnerability, however, soon gives way to smoldering blues licks, Jax coaxing soulful tt:bends and expressive vibrato that speak of longing and quiet desperation, perfectly mirroring the song's title.

This fragile peace doesn't last. As the first verse transitions towards the chorus, the acoustic is swapped for an electric, and the bluesy feel morphs into something far heavier. Jax unleashes tight, palm-muted riffs that borrow equally from classic heavy metal's rhythmic precision and the dissonant, angular structures found in progressive metal. It's here the fusion truly ignites – the lingering folk melody sometimes surfaces, ghost-like, within complex chord voicings layered over the heavy rhythm, creating a fascinating tension. The solo section is a masterclass in itself, starting with soaring, melodic rock phrasing before diving headfirst into a technically demanding passage filled with rapid alternate picking, legato runs, and even brief, unexpected stabs of alm...
